

A close-up photograph of a large pile of small, clear, faceted crystals, likely sugar or salt, resting on a light-colored, textured surface. The crystals are numerous and densely packed, with some showing distinct geometric shapes. The lighting is soft, highlighting the facets and creating subtle shadows.

Making Crystals

In science, we dissolved sugar or salt in water to form a solution. We then left the solution to evaporate in order to retrieve the solid.

